All day

Hassan II Mosque

The Hassan II Mosque is the third largest mosque in the Islamic world. One-third of it is built on the sea, reportedly in memory of the Arab ancestors who arrived in Morocco from the sea and settled there. Its roof is retractable, and its 25 automatic doors are all made of titanium alloy, resistant to seawater corrosion. Its marble floors are heated year-round, making it one of the most modern mosques in the world. Constructed entirely of white marble, the mosque is inlaid with green glazed tiles and various copper ornaments, adding a touch of vitality to its solemnity. As the only mosque in Morocco open to foreign tourists, visitors are required to remove their shoes and hats upon entry, and non-Muslims are not allowed to visit the main hall.

Square of Mohammed V

Mohammed V Square in Casablanca is popularly referred to as "Pigeons' Square." It seems literally carpeted with pigeons. The square is named for Mohammed V, celebrated former King of Morocco. New buildings went up around the square in the style of Moorish Revival so liked by architect Henri Proust.

Koutoubia Mosque

The Koutoubia Mosque is a landmark of Marrakech, serving as the center and highest point of the old city. A unique feature of the mosque is that when its minaret was built, nearly 10,000 bags of precious spices were mixed into the mud used to hold the stones together. This gave the mosque a rich fragrance that still permeates the air today, earning it the nickname "Tower of Fragrance." The mosque is closed to the public and is open only to Muslims.

Bahia Palace

Bahia Palace blends the exquisite elegance of traditional Islamic architecture with Moroccan flair, showcasing the life of a 19th-century Moroccan aristocratic family. The exquisite mosaics, towering carved arches, precious stone, and ubiquitous fountains and gardens evoke a sense of the splendor and prosperity of yesteryear.

Jardin Majorelle

A French fashion designer named Yves Saint Laurent and his partner Pierre Bergé bought Jardin Majorelle in 1980 to preserve the vision of its original owner. The French landscape painter Jacques Majorelle was the original owner, and his mission was to always keep it open to the public.

Djemaa El Fna

From sunrise to late at night, you can see Indian snake charmers, Arabs selling spiced tea, Moroccan old men telling stories and fortune-telling, various performances, and countless stalls selling food, drinks, clothing, carpets, decorations, leather, and handicrafts. It is like Lan Kwai Fong in Hong Kong and Xintiandi in Shanghai. Because of this square, Marrakech has infinite vitality.
